The Unemployment Crisis: A Generation in Despair

Uganda, a nation blessed with a youthful population, faces a daunting crisis, one that continues to widen the gap between dreams and reality for millions of young people: unemployment with thousands of graduates emerging from Makerere University each year, alongside many other institutions across the country, the question remains; ‘where are the jobs? The statistics are staggering, yet the reality is even more sobering.

As of recent reports, Uganda’s unemployment rate of over 13 percent, and the underemployment, two figures are even higher. The number of graduates entering the job market each year is growing exponentially, but the opportunities available are few and far between. The youth, who represent over 75 percent of the population, are caught in a vicious cycle, education without opportunity aspiration without realisation. This is not just a statistical issue, it’s a matter of the future generation, and it is high time that Uganda confronted this challenge head on.

In Uganda, education is often seen as the key to a brighter future. Universities churn out thousands of graduates annually, each armed with degrees and dreams of success. However, the job market has proven to be a cruel reality for many. The lack of alignment between what students are taught and what the job market demands is a major factor in the rising unemployment rate. Many graduates find themselves with degrees that do not correspond to available positions. For instance, degrees in fields like humanities, social sciences and some technical courses have few direct opportunities in the labour market.
